

Introduction to Machine Learning

Machine learning is a subset of artificial intelligence that enables computers to learn from data without being explicitly programmed.

The three main types are: supervised learning, unsupervised learning, and reinforcement learning. Supervised learning uses labeled data.

Applications and Conclusion

Common applications include image recognition, natural language processing, and recommendation systems. Neural networks form the backbone of deep learning approaches. In conclusion, machine learning continues to transform industries worldwide.